

American Jewish World Service

Winter Docket

American Jewish World Service (AJWS), an international development and human rights organization motivated by Judaism's imperative to pursue justice, has recently awarded more than $5.7 million to 224 grassroots project partners in 33 countries. This total marks an increase of nearly $2 million over its last grants review in June. The new grants are divided into five categories, which include sustainable livelihoods and development, community health, community voice, education for all, and community engagement in conflict and emergencies. They provide funding to organizations in Africa, Asia and the Americas.

Included in this winter docket, are several of AJWS's grantees working on issues related to the HIV/AIDS pandemic in South Africa. One of these grantees, African Solutions to African Problems, provides financial support and educational, health and agricultural expertise to community-based organizations in remote areas of South Africa. AJWS funds their work to support community-based organizations that provide home based care and nutrition to orphans and vulnerable children and adults impacted by HIV/AIDS.

To learn more about AJWS's work in South Africa and throughout the world, click here:

www.ajws.org